A house on the Mississippi Gulf coast, damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Mix of flavors makes New Orleans great

By SANCHEZ PEREZ

Tuesday, Jan. 17, 2012

Pensacola News-Journal

People's tendency to continue to blame others. Without fail, there is always someone who comes along and says the most insignificant thing at the worst time imaginable.

And now, when New Orleans is destroyed, torn by people's uncertainty about their future, and forever changed, Mayor Nagin's speech could be considered the ultimate last straw.

In his speech on Martin Luther King Jr. Day, in which he said "The city that was my home is no more," Mayor Nagin's speech was not seen as an act of healing, but rather as an act of destruction. It was a speech that tore apart the fabric of the city, leaving nothing but a void in its place.

Nagin's words were filled with anger and frustration, directed at those who were affected by the hurricane. He talked about the destruction that had occurred, about the loss of lives and property, and about the need for change.

But Nagin's speech was not just about the destruction that had occurred. It was also about the future of New Orleans. He talked about the city's potential, about the strength of its people, and about the hope that existed in the face of adversity.

For many people, Nagin's speech was a source of comfort. It was a reminder that, even in the face of disaster, there was still hope. It was a reminder that, even in the face of destruction, there was still a chance for recovery.

But for others, Nagin's speech was a source of anger. It was a reminder of the destruction that had occurred, and of the loss that had been suffered. It was a reminder of the need for change, and of the need for action.

In the end, Nagin's speech was a speech that divided people. Some saw it as a speech of hope, a speech of healing, and a speech of recovery. Others saw it as a speech of anger, a speech of frustration, and a speech of destruction.

But regardless of how people saw it, Nagin's speech was a powerful speech. It was a speech that spoke to the heart of the city, and to the heart of the people who lived there.

And in the end, it was a speech that changed people. It was a speech that brought people together, and that showed that, even in the face of disaster, there was still a chance for recovery. It was a speech that showed that, even in the face of destruction, there was still a chance for hope.

And for that, Nagin's speech will always be remembered as a powerful and inspiring speech. It will always be remembered as a speech that spoke to the heart of the city, and to the heart of the people who lived there.