ENNIS, Minn. — They ought to call Disney's Animal Kingdom the Kingdom of Death. It's entirely appropriate.

Despite the publicity, the park is really just an extraordinary zoo with a theme park attached. The zoo is divided into different sections, each showing a different part of the world, and the animals are in their natural habitats.

After hearing all the stories about the animals that die in the park, you begin to wonder if these animals are really happy. Or do they, like us, or like birds, monkeys, and lizards, find their own little areas to live in.

Instead of the natural barriers and wide open spaces the park provides, these animals are in cages, sometimes not much more than 12 feet above eye level. These animals aren't as comfortable as they could be.

For the most part they were the animals that died.

After this disappointment, I went to see the Lion King show. The show is very well done. The animals are all clothed in bright colors, which is necessary because of the heat.

I've been guilty, in my time, of being much noise seeping out of the forbidden caves of renovations, when it was clear that something was being done. But if it was clear to me, it was even clearer to our readers.
